In: Mediatika. Cuadernos de Medios de Comunicación. 17, 79-109

Abstract: Hybridizing is an often used method, with the aim of innovating, in production or business. It is the junction of two or three companies or sectors, in order to invent new products, beneficial to all participants of the process. We have tried to experiment this method with the Basque newspaper Berria. Beforehand, we have analyzed the activity of Berria in social network and the opinion of young people about this newspaper. Considering the fact that young people use essentially smartphones, we have proposed to explore possibilities of innovating products in this sector. After some meeting and interview, the culture center Tabakalera has been elected to experiment hybridization with Berria. We do not achieve the aim, and the experiment has ended without new product. However, this process has given some tracks for other opportunities.

In fact, after decades of «bad press» and negative connotations related to this movement's social practices and behaviour style (ideology of excess), the movement has been revitalised and revisibilised thanks to diverse factors, being one of the most evident the technological one, symbolised by the digital social networks.

Abstract: Throughout the last five years, transsexuality has progressively moved out of the shadow of the private sphere to public debate. Of course, the media are not oblivious to this phenomenon. All this has led to an exponential increase in the pieces of information on this fact of sexual diversity and, consequently, also to a better treatment of these realities by the media. The present pilot study analyzes the representation of transsexuality in the general press and in digital media at the state level from a sexological point of view.
